Lincoln's Second Inaugural. President Lincoln's second inaugural. although neither he nor the world were aware of it at the time, was virtually his farewell address to the American people. "Malice toward none, charity for all," was its substance. It is said that a hearer remarked as he closed, "It is the greatest State paper ever produce l. It's greatness consisted mainly in the spirit of the Old and New Testament exhibited in it. At the funeral of Louis XIV, commonly called the "Grand," the preacher said: "God only is great." So in the history of ethical and political progress it may be justly said of all utterances promotive of Christian civilization-the Bible only is great, The Professor of Old Testament Liter. Kocher took upwards of 200 | ter in the Bible," It did. Because it was in spirit, as well as in words, so largely taken from the Bible.

The second inaugural was substantially an evolution from the whole of Mr. Lincoln's previous life. He was even then, though he knew it not, on the verge of eternity. The last words of men, as in the case of Socrates, and in an infinitely higher sense of our Lord Jesus Christ, are invested with a peculiar

Mr. Lincoln said very early in the war that the issues then at stake were too momentous for "malice," frivolity or personal ambition. This was the keynote of his last utterances.

The Professor already alluded to suggested to me at the same time that the rebellion might, still be drawn out to eight, instead of four years, as the American Revolution had been, notwithstanding the surrender of Burgoyne midway. Mr. Lincoln seems to have contemplated the same contingency by the bondsman's two hundred and another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so, still it must be said, "the judgments of the
